ALBEMARLE FARMER MAKES SUCCESS WITH GREENHOUSE TOMATOES

Everybody knows about orchids and December roses coming from greenhouses, but among new things under the sun in Virginia are greenhouse tomatoes, ripened on the vine by a combination of sunlight through glass and artificial heat.

There is a pioneer in this field in Albemarle County, reports the current issue of the Virginia Economic Review, quarterly publication of the Division of Planning and Economic Development, Virginia Department of Conservation and Development.

David A. Smith, proprietor of Whistle Field Farm, near Greenwood, harvestcd his first crop from 4,000 plants last July, a yield of 21,000 pounds of choice tomatoes. He has a second crop ready for market now.

An article in the April, 1952, issue of the Virginia Economic Review brought to Smith's attention the possibility of growing tomatoes under glass. It made sense to him that here might be a way to balance his farm program. A farm producing beef cattle could spare an acre or so for a venture which might be highly profitable, even if it hadn't been tried in Virginia before. Smith didn't get around to doing anything about it, however, until 1955 when he went out to Ohio to look over the greenhouses that have been set up to grow tomatoes in the Toledo and Cleveland areas. He liked what he saw, found out all he could about procedures and equipment, and was reassured that here in Ohio, production of tomatoes under glass on a large scale was a well-established and profitable industry.

Smith started construction of two greenhouses in October, 1955, and by the end of July this year had harvested his first crop. An initial capital investment of $75,000 financed the building of the glass houses, complete with heating and sprinkling equipment and other accessories. He has now added another greenhouse, bringing his total investment to about $100,000, and he has more than an acre of tomatoes under glass.

No difficulty has been met in finding a market for Whistle Field tomatoes. Smith sold his entire first crop readily in Charlottesville, a few miles from his farm, even though outdoor tomatoes were in season at the time. He expects to sell future crops in Charlottesville too, but will ship to other points if that city leaves him with a surplus. At this time of year, when the food stores are offering cold storage or green-picked tomatoes, the vine-ripened product can be offered as a "choice" item.

"No doubt there are many other Virginia farmers who would like to diversify their present crop or livestock program," the Review article suggests. "Why not do what David Smith has done? If he can sell his entire crop of greenhouse tomatoes in Charlottesville, why couldn't someone in Southwest Virginia do the same on the Roanoke, Radford, or Bristol markets? Or someone in the vicinity of Richmond or Petersburg? Or in the Portsmouth-Norfolk area? There are plenty of out-of-state markets, too. . . ."

Farmers interested may write to the Division of Planning and Economic Development, 301 State Finance Building, Richmond 19, Va., for further information about the greenhouse tomato business.
